Waukegan, Ill. (AP) — Three months after a parade in Waukegan, Ill., ended in tragedy, the injured and traumatized are leaning on each other as they move forward.

The parade on Oct. 10, 2017, was a celebration for the city's 100th anniversary. It was a day of joy and pride, but it ended in tragedy. A parade float carrying a large, ornate float was struck by a truck, causing it to flip and crash into a crowd of people.

The tragedy left many people injured and traumatized. Some were killed, and many others were left with serious injuries. The community was shocked and grieving.

But in the months since the tragedy, the community has come together. People who were injured are helping each other heal. They are sharing their stories and supporting each other through the difficult process of recovery.

"We are family," says one of the survivors. "We are all in this together, and we are all working to move forward. We are all helping each other heal and rebuild our lives."

The community is also working to prevent such tragedies from happening again. They are advocating for better safety measures and more oversight for parade floats.

While the road ahead is still long and difficult, the community is hopeful. They are determined to rebuild and move forward together. They are determined to show the world that they are a resilient and caring community.

The tragedy has changed the community, but it has also brought people closer together. They are stronger now than they were before. They are a family, and they are moving forward together.

The community is also working to support the families of those who were killed. They are providing financial assistance and emotional support. They are helping them to grieve and find a way forward.

The tragedy has also inspired people to get involved in their community. They are volunteering at local charities and helping those in need. They are making a difference in their community, one person at a time.
