Van Orden statement on WOTUS ruling

Today, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in favor of Michael and Chantell Sackett in Sackett v. Environmental Protection Agency.

"The unanimous ruling in Sackett v. EPA is a direct blow to President Biden's war on our farmers who feed our nation and the world," said Van Orden. "I will always stand with them."

For months, President Biden sowed confusion with his Environmental Protection Agency's flawed and burdensome WOTUS rule, which presented sweeping changes to the federal government's authority to regulate what is considered a navigable water. This ruling will provide much-needed certainty to America's farmers, manufacturers, small business owners, and private property owners.

Policy

In developing vaccines and treatments for the Covid-19 virus, American researchers and their partners literally saved the world -- as well as the world economy. With unprecedented speed, new technology stemmed the tide of death and illness brought on by the virus and enabled world economies to re-energize in the aftermath. Without the promise of strong IP protection, none of these inventions would have occurred.

The technology and the treatments that followed demonstrated the apex of American scientific innovation and collaboration. These innovations and resources hold great promise for future discoveries in the battle against Alzheimer's, HIV, cancer, and other diseases. But not if we give them away.

Even worse is that there's no evidence waiving the IP for Covid-19 vaccines and treatments will help patients in disadvantaged countries obtain medicines any quicker. The healthcare delivery systems and medical treatment infrastructure in these countries remain woefully inadequate. America's life-science companies have made great strides in assisting developing countries with the care and delivery of medicines. While there is much more to be done, it's abundantly clear by now that the supply of these products is not the challenge.

The expedient political benefit from waiving IP rights does not yield the best and most effective policy for patients around the world. American workers, from the lab bench to manufacturing construction sites, can fully provide the discoveries and cures needed to supply the world. They can do so while maintaining a strong U.S. industrial base that provides good jobs, benefits, and security to American workers.

In the end, a safe supply of medicines developed here in the United States to treat the scourge of disease remains the best long-term solution to current and future pandemics. Countries around the globe will benefit from the best scientists working in the best labs built and maintained by the best workers in the world.

When it comes to IP and world politics, the best long-term policy will make for the best possible politics.
