

Pictured above: Still (left), Simms and Rix.

When the Legislature acts, The State Journal is there.

 Wisconsin
State Journal

Patricia Simms, team leader of the State Journal's State Capitol reporting team directs coverage of the Legislature while also reporting on the governor's office and state politics. A graduate of the Medill School of Journalism at Northwestern University, Ms. Simms joined The State Journal in 1969. She covered the federal, state and county court systems for several years after working as a general assignment reporter. She has covered the Legislature since the 1973 session and gives in-depth coverage to the State Department of Health and Social Services (DHSS).

Thomas W. Still covered all levels of local government, the City of Madison, its suburbs and Dane County before switching to the state government beat this summer. He now reports on several state agencies, including the Assembly and the Department of Industry, Labor and Human Relations, which are his main assignments. Still, 26, is a 1973 graduate of Drake University and a native of the Washington, D.C., area. Before joining The State Journal staff in 1976, he covered local government for the Mason City, Iowa, Globe-Gazette.

Paul A. Rix, the third member of The State Journal's Capitol team, covers the state Senate and the Department of Transportation. Rix, a native of Wisconsin, also covered the state Public Service Commission and the Department of Natural Resources for eight months. A graduate of Springfield College in Massachusetts, he spent one year with the Clintonville (Wisconsin) Tribune and five years with the Kankakee (Illinois) Daily Journal.

For convenient home delivery call: 252-6363